I was on the brink of declaring it a good thing when your mother said, "I'm sorry, sir, but I can't allow you to take this home."

"But Mr. Johnson, I'm in a terrible bind. My children are hungry, and this loaf of bread will last them for the next week."

"I understand, Mr. Johnson," your mother replied. "But it's against our policy to give away food."

You stood there, mouth open, as your father cleared his throat and said, "Well, Mr. Johnson, I suppose we can make an exception in this case."

You relief was short-lived, though, as your father added, "But we can't give you the entire loaf."

"That's fine," you said, "I'll take what I can get."

You left the supermarket with a small bag full of bread, thankful for your father's intervention.

As you walked home, you couldn't help but think about how fortunate you were to have a family who would stand by you in times of need.

The lady was inside a car. She had just bought it last week.

At the end of the road, there was a big, dark forest. It was impossible to tell what was inside.

The crocodile winced. He was afraid of the darkness. He had never seen such a thing before.

You see, said the crocodile, you only think you know something. And yet...

Oh, I'm afraid it's not so simple, you know.
