Rare Vagrants
Shanna Compton
No luck in the morning fade his points of white teeth. impressions in the shape of a half swoon the rubbing places seen in summer on the young trees luxuriantly matched born into willows highish pillows lit against his vivid breath Being dangled over short of disaster her inclination peters out in a felting and she is bound like the gait of all mammals in flight the hind feet ahead of the fore the hoofed game most stags are avid to eat it theirs is a root stock bearing Also in pines where the soil runs narrow like a long arched body and the juices flow from the tree wounds or they may do it to relieve boredom roar and duel with rivals in the middle of October scraps of an interior they’ve invented flattened on their hideous sofa His wings do not cover her whole body endangered by her larvae he goes metallic green and rather shiny a violent sort of blue in fine, close-lying hair among his upper parts bronze-brown against her abdomen of pollen and red legs his heart of hedge nettle Bare moist skin rich in glands they achieve the shape of the perfect animal using her sticky extendable tongue her mature gut clad in permanent armor as he branches into leather yellow cracks of bark stinking of the sap of aspen gone into July with the poplars musk they live to a great old age They are so young with white soft prickles wiping themselves on dead washcloths after going wrong in a back bedroom she is shorter than her own body and a wolf for coppery-red damages she pads him out with turf using her twin claws to groom his fur glossily exuding a putrid bouquet Which one of them is black with orange markings at the first and last stages in a very pale coating of down-flecked legs corded lightly in ribbons their calls are various and domestic their language of distinct hoots broken in over the backyards where they skinned and fiercely wanted incantations To power through their meager lots he breaks the quiet with a sooty black cough he wonders aloud if there’s anything left to put in his short blunt mouth yes she says have my hard seeds bite off this light shoot while softly buzzing she injects saliva into the sting and sucks in hot thundery weather Rare Vagrants | Shanna Compton

Materials include leftover cardstocks and papers from prior chapbooks; a 1990s Mexico-themed poster; Bomb and National Geographic magazines; a field guide to Northern European animals; abandoned drafts; stray pronouns; overheard conversations; and various paperstuffs I found lying around the house. Designed for display as a wall hanging or mobile, measuring approximately 28.5” x 4”, or closes as an accordion with raffia tie. Handmade in an edition of 40, March-May 2010. This is the electronic edition. Dusie Kollektiv 4: 2010 | dusie.org